If you see a little square island floating in the waters of the Lake at Fountain City you'll probably wonder what it is and how it got there. There's a story behind it.

A few weeks ago the Spring AP Environmental Science Class at Central High School had hoped to launch a floating habitat and found that additional buys were needed. The habitat is an experiment to see if the rubber intake by installed plants in the little habitat would help to remove digital growth in the lake.

Last month the floating habitat was launched again to see if the idea works, according to Ruth Anne Hanahan the Adopt-A-Watershed Coordinator with the University of Tennessee.

"We'll keep the floating habitat in for at least a month on a trial period," she told The Focus.

Hanahan said the ducks have taken to the float and already laid eggs on it.

"The intent was not, exactly to support the duck population but there is certainly no way we can discriminate," she said, adding that the plants around the float appear to be struggling but that water for the roots and that sufficient rains might allow time for the roots to penetrate the fabric underneath.

If the plants do well, if not, we'll remove the habitat and let the spring class of 2018 work on it," Hanahan said.

interact with candidates at Expo

By Kim Lay

Voters in Knoxville and Knox County voters had the chance to meet dozens of candidates running in the 2017 city and 2018 county elections Thursday night at the Knoxville Expo Center.

Five of the nine city council seats are open this year due to term limits.

Two of the four candidates seeking the First District seat were present Thursday as Rebecca Parr and Greg Knox appeared. Andrew Wilson was absent. Stephanie Welch had campaign personnel at the event but she missed it due to a prior commitment.

Knox said he was pleased that so many candidates for the city and county elections turned out to meet voters. But he was disappointed with apparent voter apathy at last week's meet-and-greet event.

"We had a good turnout with
