

Civil rights leaders honored by overpass signs

By Pete Gaudin

Three Knoxville champions of the civil rights movement were honored Saturday by having interstate overpasses named for them. Harold Middlebrook, Theotis Robinson and Diane Jordan were honored at the official overpass naming ceremony held at the Back Cultural Exchange Center by members of the Tennessee Black Caucus of State Legislators.

Rep. Fenech Reppel, after welcoming remarks, said she was grateful for history being unveiled that day. She said that, Knoxville has some of the best people who do the best things. "You are always welcome at the Back," she told the around 75 guests including elected officials, Tennessee Democratic Party officials and candidates for city council.

The Emerald Youth Center's hopes to build a $9 million facility in Lonsdale came one step closer to a reality recently when the Knox County Commission agreed to give the city a portion of the Sam E. Hill School Property.

The commission voted unanimously to pass a "no recommendation" of the gift, located at 1725 Denmore Avenue, on to today's regular meeting with some stipulations. The donated empty lot from the Board of Education, coupled with the city's promise of $1 million, means plans for the community center can move ahead.

"Thank you for all you do," Commissioner Brad Anders told Steve Diggs, who briefly addressed the commission's work session. Knoxville Public Works Director David Shae said, "This is a community with real needs for youth" in speaking of Lonsdale.

"Our initiative is to bring about transformation of youth and it's unlike any project I've been involved with," Diggs told the commissioners.

Chairman Dave Wight said the resolution allows the law department to back out of the agreement until the contract is signed and explained that the property would not be transferred until both the city and county major sign it.
