You might call it a historic decision. The Knoxville City Council voted Tuesday evening to postpone any decision on expanding the H-1 Historic Zone for six months. Councilman Daniel Brown made the successful motion.

For almost a year the idea of adding more than 400 homes, many of them not designated as historic, to the existing district, pitted neighbor against neighbor. Opponents charged that the proposed designation would eventually drive poorer neighbors out and increase the property values and impose restrictions and expenses on existing home owners.
