Knoxville 1st Tennessee city certified as wildlife habitat

There was more than the opening of a new park to be celebrated last Monday, as City officials cut the ribbon on the recently acquired and renovated Forest Heights Pocket Park, located at 411 Highland Hills Road.

Until last week, the 0.8-acre park had been split into 32 parcels owned by the Forest Heights neighborhood association. The city will maintain it on a regular basis.

The park features a paved walking loop, picnic tables and play equipment, including new swings and a natural playground installed by City crews.

During the ceremony, Mayor Madeline Rogero announced that Knoxville has just been named the first city in Tennessee to be certified

East Tennessee's trademark," said Mayor Rogero. "Whether it be the 1,000-acre Urban Wilderness or a smaller-than-an-acre pocket park like Forest Heights, it's a win for our kids and our grandkids."

To achieve the city-level certification, a city is required to first certify 312 sites at homes, schools or common areas that provide the four

You might call it a historic decision. The Knoxville City Council voted Tuesday evening to postpone any decision on expanding the H-1 Historic Zone for six months. Councilman Daniel Brown made the successful motion.

For almost a year the idea of adding more than 400 homes, many of them not designated as historic, to the existing district, pitted neighbor against neighbor. Opponents charged that the proposed designation would eventually force poorer neighbors out and increase the property values and impose restrictions and expenses on making home repairs.

Supporters said the expansion would protect all the homes in the
