The University of Cambridge was a case in point. According to the correspondence in February 1972, almost half the 100,000 copies distributed of the 1968 report had disappeared, more than half the total number of copies given out from 1965 to 1969. Other study researchers, using a range of strength tests and levels of force along an isometric force-length relationship, have found that strength is more sensitive to training in the isometric than in the dynamic range of force. In addition, the strength and speed-accuracy relationship is preserved in the post-training state, even in the dynamic force range, as shown by Davies et al. (1992). This result is consistent with results of other studies.

There are 100,000 left-handed people in our study, in line with previous work. However, 20 percent are identified by using the term "Lefty" (Baker & Gervais, 2009; see also Gervais et al., 2010; just as about 10% of those who played left-handed in elementary school were left-handed in college).
