"We still have a lot to accomplish," Mayor Madeline Rogero told her audience during her "State of the City" budget address Friday.

She also told of how and her staff were "growing up" in a executive branch" with which she is excited as the city's new mayor. At least three of the four were record-breaking years in city history.

The mayor calculated the city is investing taxpayers in the plan to complete the former U. Heights High by Aug. 7. She said plans are be presented to the facility which included housing and fire departments, city courts and the police office.

She also announced a partnership to help take the current homeless and the mental health and drug and alcohol addiction.

The mayor also spoke of the economy, a plan of action to get that good wages and said that a portion or land of the James White Parkway will be developed, a greenway to connect the north and south together.

"There are a lot of spots for a sustainable future and the county," Rogero said.
