

Community polling and the candidates for mayor

Community polling is a key tool for candidates for mayor to understand the needs and concerns of their constituents. It allows them to gather feedback from a diverse range of people, including those who may not be able to attend public meetings or provide input through traditional channels. This information is crucial for developing policies and programs that address the community's most pressing issues. By listening to their constituents, candidates can build trust and credibility, and ensure that their campaigns are focused on the issues that matter most to the people they represent.
