Stress and coping are to the person-based measures what the Freudian and Piagetian approaches are to the person-free. One of the first and most widely used stress scales, the stressor scale, was developed by the person-based approach. The scale has two dimensions: stressors, or aspects of the world not related to the person's thinking, and coping, or the person's thinking in relation to the world. It was the first to be used to measure the relationship between stressors and coping in a person's life. The scale has been used by the person-based approach to measure the relationship between stressors and coping in a person's life.
