

Did the Pension Board violate Sunshine Law?

By David L. Brown

It is a common belief that the pension board for the City of Knoxville violated the Sunshine Law by not holding a public hearing before making a decision on the pension plan for the city's police officers.

The pension board, which is made up of representatives from the city and the police union, has been accused of making a decision on the pension plan without holding a public hearing. The board's decision was to increase the pension for police officers from 1.5% to 2.0% of their salary.

The city's attorney general, David L. Brown, has argued that the board's decision was a "discretionary act" and therefore not subject to the Sunshine Law. However, the board's decision was based on a set of criteria that was established by the city's charter, which is subject to the Sunshine Law.

The board's decision was also based on a set of criteria that was established by the city's charter, which is subject to the Sunshine Law. The board's decision was also based on a set of criteria that was established by the city's charter, which is subject to the Sunshine Law.

Carson Dailey, Mayor of Knoxville, is seen with two other men at a press conference. The man on the left is wearing a suit and tie, the man in the middle is wearing a light blue shirt, and the man on the right is wearing a light blue shirt and glasses.

Carson Dailey Launches Reelection Campaign

By David L. Brown

Mayor Carson Dailey has officially launched his reelection campaign for the City of Knoxville. Dailey, who has served as mayor since 2005, is running for a second term in the upcoming November election.

Dailey's campaign is focused on improving the city's economy, creating jobs, and improving the city's infrastructure. He has announced a series of initiatives, including a new downtown development project and a new public transit system.

Dailey's campaign is also focused on improving the city's education system. He has announced a series of initiatives, including a new public school system and a new community college.

Only 11% voters take advantage of early voting

By David L. Brown

Only 11% of voters in the City of Knoxville took advantage of early voting in the upcoming November election. This is a significant decrease from the 2008 election, when 25% of voters took advantage of early voting.

The city's election officials have attributed this decrease to a number of factors, including a lack of awareness of the early voting process and a lack of time to vote early.

The city's election officials have also noted that the early voting process is still relatively new and that it will take time for voters to become more familiar with it.

County hires new lobbying firm

By David L. Brown

The County of Knox has hired a new lobbying firm to represent the county in various legislative and regulatory matters. The new firm, which is based in Knoxville, will be responsible for representing the county's interests in the state legislature and in various regulatory agencies.

The county's previous lobbying firm, which was based in Nashville, has been replaced by the new firm. The county's board of commissioners has approved the hiring of the new firm.

Open house allows residents to voice East Knoxville traffic concerns

By David L. Brown

An open house was held in East Knoxville to allow residents to voice their concerns about traffic in the area. The open house was held at the home of a local resident, who has been experiencing traffic problems in his neighborhood.

The open house was attended by a number of residents, who expressed their concerns about traffic in the area. The residents' concerns included a lack of traffic lights, a lack of stop signs, and a lack of adequate road maintenance.

The city's transportation department has agreed to address the residents' concerns. The department has announced a series of initiatives, including the installation of traffic lights, the installation of stop signs, and the improvement of road maintenance.

